From the tractor

Steve Troxler
Commissioner

Just last month I wrote in this column about how much I look forward to spring and the beginning of the growing season. With the unseasonably warm weather we were having in mid-March, I guess I was being optimistic that we had put winter behind us.

Truth is, I couldn't have been more wrong, as evidenced by the Easter weekend freeze that set new record-low temperatures for the state and brought devastating damage to fruit, vegetable and nursery crops.

Although initial damage estimates from the freeze totaled nearly $112 million, we are continuing to assess the situation to determine if there will be longer-term damage done to trees and plants. This is a very real possibility, but we'll have to wait and see.

As of press time, we have had reports of about $58 million in damage to nursery stock, $26.5 million to fruits and vegetables, $12 million in damage to corn and around $12 million to wheat and other small grains.

It is important to remember these are initial estimates and could go up or down as more information is gathered. Some of the freeze damage might not be evident for several more weeks or even months from now.

Shortly after the freeze, we heard from farmers from one end of the state to the other about the type of problems they were having with their crops. Initially we were concerned strawberries would be hit hard because they were coming in a bit earlier than normal, but while there was damage, overall they seemed

(See Freeze, pg. 12)

Freeze causes estimated $112 million in damage

Easter weekend's sub-freezing temperatures caused an estimated $111.7 million in crop losses in North Carolina, based on initial reports from all 100 counties, according to Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler.

"This is a staggering preliminary estimate," Troxler said. "The Easter weekend freeze affected crops in the mountains, at the coast and everywhere in between. It could be days, even weeks, before we know the true extent of the damage."

The damage estimate comes from flash reports submitted by U.S. Farm Service Agency offices in counties across North Carolina.

According to the flash reports, nursery crops suffered the highest losses, $57.9 million. Fruits and vegetables, which include apples, peaches and various berries, suffered estimated losses of $26.5 million. Other crops affected by the freeze included corn, wheat, barley and Irish potatoes.

Troxler encouraged farmers to contact their local cooperative extension agent or Farm Service Agency office to report damage. County reports are vital to obtaining thorough damage estimates, he said.

"We are trying to determine the full extent of losses in the state, plus find out which losses were insured and which were not," Troxler said. "We want to have the most accurate assessment of the situation possible, so that we can move forward in making requests on behalf of the agricultural community."

All farmers, whether or not they have crop insurance, should document the severity and extent of crop damage with pictures or video, Troxler said.

Care should be used when transporting pesticides

As the 2007 planting season ramps up, Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler reminds farmers to take precautions when transporting pesticides, including properly securing them and not transporting them in the passenger area of a vehicle.

"Traffic accidents can occur at anytime, even when you're traveling a short distance, so it pays to use extra caution," Troxler said. "If pesticide containers aren't properly loaded, they can fall off a vehicle or become punctured or torn, which increases the potential for people, animals and the environment to be exposed to these chemicals."

The following are important tips to keep in mind when transporting pesticides:

-- Always transport pesticides separately from food, seed, grain, livestock feed, minerals and fertilizer.

-- Do not carry pesticides in the passenger compartment of cars, vans or trucks. Vapors released from pesticides can be hazardous to the driver and passengers, and the chemicals can cause injury if spilled. The driver is responsible and potentially liable if anyone is accidentally exposed to pesticides transported in an unlocked truck compartment or open-bed truck. Whenever possible, safely transport pesticides in locked compartments, and use two forms of containment if possible.

-- Never allow children, other passengers or pets to ride with pesticides.

-- Keep a hazardous-material spill kit in the vehicle, especially if you frequently transport pesticides. These kits commonly contain chemical-resistant gloves, coveralls, goggles, shovel, dust pan, broom, absorbent pads and absorbent materials such as non-chlorinated pet litter, heavy-duty plastic bags, and a temporary storage container preferably made of plastic.

-- When possible, inspect all containers at the time of purchase and before loading. Accept the product only if labels are legible and firmly attached. Check all caps and tighten them if necessary. Avoid tossing, sliding or dragging containers over rough surfaces that could rip, tear or puncture. Never transport damaged or leaking pesticide containers.

-- Secure all containers to

Freeze damage

to have fared much better than our state's peach, blueberry, apple, small grains and nursery crops.

Still, reports from Western North Carolina indicate damage to strawberries in the mountain areas was far worse than in the coastal areas, including reports of 70 to 90 percent losses for some farms.

A number of apple and peach producers reported 90 to 100 percent loss of their crops, and reports of blueberry damage ranged from moderate to severe depending on whether farmers could spray plants with water to insulate them. Several apple growers have indicated this loss will mean 18 months without income from their crop.

Dry winter weather also had an impact on the crops as some farmers saw irrigation ponds dry up before the cold weather moved out of the state, severely limiting their ability to insulate crops with water. Many growers have described the situation as a perfect set of conditions for an agricultural disaster.

To add insult to injury, we heard reports that strong winds that blew through the state April 16 toppled or snapped a number of apple trees in the mountains. Reports are still coming in at press time, but no figures for damage estimates have been reported at this time.

North Carolina farmers were not alone in crop losses, with much of the Southeast experiencing similar situations. I have been in contact with my counterparts in the Southeast to determine the extent of the overall regional damage in the event federal assistance becomes available.

I have also assembled a group within the department to assess the overall damage, determine where the damage is located in the state and see what amount of losses was insured or uninsured.

We want to be sure we have the most accurate assessment we can of the damage, so whatever steps are necessary next, we will have the best information to move forward in making requests on behalf of the agricultural community.

In North Carolina, we are familiar with agricultural losses due to natural disasters, but these typically come in the form of hurricanes, tornadoes and flooding. Losses due to late spring freezes have been more rare.

To put this event in perspective, estimated losses from this freeze will exceed the total losses of more than $111 million from hurricanes Bonnie, Charlie and Frances combined in 2004.

I ask you to keep our farmers in our prayers and thoughts as they seek to recover from this devastating natural disaster.

Tax breaks offered for farm and open space preservation

Farmers interested in keeping their land open and available for agriculture may be able to take advantage of significant federal tax incentives for placing a conservation easement on their property.

A conservation easement is a voluntary written agreement between a landowner and a qualified conservation organization in which the landowner agrees to keep the land in its natural state, and the organization is given the right to monitor the property to make sure the agreement is upheld.

The landowner still retains ownership of the land and can sustainably farm it as before. The easement assures protection against development and may offer the landowner tax savings.

While conservation easements have historically provided financial relief for farmers, the passage of a new federal law has greatly increased the tax benefits to their largest amounts to date.

On Aug. 17, President George Bush signed into law a bill that expands federal tax incentives for conservation easement donations with these changes:

Qualifying farmers and ranchers can now deduct up to 100 percent of their annual income;

To qualify, farmers or ranchers must earn more than 50 percent of their gross income from the business of farming in the taxable year in which the conservation easement is donated. The 100 percent deductible rule also applies to farmers and ranchers who operate as a corporation.

Second, the property must be used or available for use for agriculture or livestock production, and remain available for agriculture or livestock production after implementing the conservation easement.

Farmers and ranchers who do not qualify for the 100 percent deduction may still benefit from the expanded charitable deduction for landowners.

The rate of charitable deduction landowners can take for donations of conservation agreements has been increased from 30 percent of their annual income to 50 percent.

The time period for which qualified donors can take tax deductions increased from six to 16 years.

These changes apply only to easements in 2006 and 2007. Therefore, there is a narrow window of opportunity to take advantage of these tax incentives. To qualify for these tax benefits, projects must be completed prior to Dec. 31, 2007.

"This is a tremendous opportunity for people who love their family land and want to keep owning and farming it," said Reid Wilson, executive director of the Conservation Trust for North Carolina, the service center for 23 local land trusts. "For individuals who are considering preserving their land through conservation easements, now is the time to do it."

Safety

the vehicle to prevent load shifts and to reduce container damage. Containers made of paper, cardboard or similar materials should always be protected from rain or moisture. In addition, protect pesticides from extreme heat and cold, which can reduce the effectiveness of the pesticide and cause damage to the container.

-- Practice the same care when transporting empty pesticide bags and containers. Residual exposure – whether by dust, granules, powder or liquid – also poses potential environmental hazards. For example, if an empty insecticide bag blows off a truck and ends up in a lake, it could cause a fish kill.

-- Take the time to read and follow the label carefully. It provides information about special hazards and safety instructions for handling and disposing of pesticides.

-- If there is an accident that involves a pesticide spill on a highway, contact the local sheriff's office or the local police department, the local emergency management services and the Structural Pest Control and Pesticides Division of the N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services at (919) 733-3556. Keep unauthorized people from entering the spill area until authorities arrive.
